

All my dogs want to do is be close to their wolfpack. It's so simple. You can see it on their faces when I get home or am getting ready to leave, "I love you, why did you leave?" "I love you, why can't I go with you?" If only life as a human could be filled with so much basic emotion.

If only the human world was amoral. Not without morality, but such that morality wasn't always so grey. If we could agree on the meaning of "good," imagine what we could accomplish as a people, as a planet. Sadly, such thoughts are nothing more than a waste of time. Some humans could never love me as much as my puppies, regardless of how many times I feed or pet

I've said this before, but it warrants mentioning again, religious beliefs will be the root of what destroys humanity. With many years of religious schooling, elementary & college, I know there is good in religion, but I don't think the good outweighs the bad. One of the defining characteristics of being alive is that we know not happens when we die. A healthy respect for death, our own as well as those around us, may be the unofficial definition for the word "PEACE."

Belief that death brings with it a reward is DANGEROUS, This is because of the "good" problem mentioned previously. If this is the only shot we get, and most importantly, we all believe it's the only shot we get... That would be heavenly.
